SCENE AT A THEATRE (FROM THE JAPANEIE.)

The red curtain which hides the platform and performers from the gazo of the audience when required and on which are written several large characters, is down, and the audience are waiting for the perfer mance to commence. At length the sound of a drum is beard, together with the tones of the saint aen and the clapping of the biyashigi (blocks of wood used as a signal) and the curtain rises slowly. The scene represented is an imitative view of middicht. There is a londy road, on each side of which is a dense wood: and beyond is a stream enamed by a marrow and daugerous bridge:

Near this bridge, hand in hand, stand young man, who is fashionably dressed, and a young woman with her head and face wrapped up. They are contemplating spicide by drowning in the stream. A merchant is accidestally passing that way.
